Finally, Internet security that really works

As use of the Internet continues to grow, so does the need to protect your online privacy and the confidential information stored on your PC. Your connection, too, needs to be secured so that hackers can't threaten the security of your computer while it's connected to the Internet or a home network.

More users, more speed, more connectivity, more content, more e-businesses, more online communities – the opportunities afforded by today's Internet were unthinkable even five years ago. But the growth of the Internet's positive side has been accompanied by an equally significant growth of 'dark side' activities.

Unfortunately, no online activity is truly safe anymore. E-mail has become a constant headache with ubiquitous spam, phishing, worms and viruses. Playing online games is fraught with the risks of spyware infection and computer hijacking. PCs linked together – whether through LANs, P2P or wireless networks – face the risk of unauthorized intrusions.

Even just browsing a website can silently and instantly infect a computer with spyware through so-called drive-by downloads. Today, more than ever before, every online computer user needs the best protection possible.
